Before testing the all-wheel drive, check that any vehicle occurs that the brakes work, the tires have the recommended pressure and the engine fluids are at the correct levels. Search rust around the doors and under the vehicle. The excessive rust will give you an indication of how often the previous owner used the off-road vehicle and how well it maintained it. Locate the four-wheel drive high button on the dashboard. It could also be a second shifter on your right. It will be marked 4hi. Drive the vehicle as normal and press the button or move to 4hi. You can engage 4hi at any time and speed. You could hear a light sound "clunking" while the transfer case below and in the front of the driver's side engages the four-wheel drive system; It's normal. However, all continuous grinding noises are a notice of damage to the four-wheel drive system. Turn the vehicle to the left and right while moving. On a dissolved or wet surface, it should turn normally. If you are in Dried, you might feel that the tires take a bit as if they were capturing against the ground; this is fine. However, popping noises from any wheel can be a sign of joint damage or constant speed boots. The cv joints and boots are the mechanisms that allow you to turn a wheel. Locate the four-wheel drive button the low key on the dash or on the shifter. It will be marked 4LO. Stop the vehicle. You can't engage the 4lo until you're still. Insert 4LO by pressing the button or move. Drive the vehicle forward. come on. You will not be able to drive to a speed much higher than 5 mph. It is used 4lo when you go steep hills or need heavy power. Listen for the same warning noises you did when the 4hi occurs. Turn the vehicle for the time left and right in 4 it. Stop the vehicle and turn off or move to four driving wheels to return to two drive wheels. Continue to check how to do with any other type of vehicle.
