Unlike the Automotive Color Trends, the Color Report uses market data on automotive production and determines color preferences on a global and regional level using this data. The analysis also compares color matches and deviations between different segments. BASF uses this information in customer consulting and incorporates it in the development of new color shades. In 2021, the automotive industry faced new challenges that it had never faced before. The total number of vehicles built on the world's assembly lines in 2020 and 2021 was significantly lower than the years before. That put a sharper point on the popularity of certain color spaces in the BASF Color Report 2021 for Automotive OEM Coatings, while knocking some perennial favorites down a few points. The achromatic colors - white, black, gray, and silver - are still the most popular. They have classic, timeless beauty, and a connection to both the environment and high technology. But some cracks are showing in their armor as new color spaces emerge. As predicted by BASF's designers years ago, blue is having a moment in the sun. Red is also rising - taking market share from the achromatic colors in many parts of the world. Even though the numbers are smaller, green and beige still show up in the data, and the colors aren't the typical shades you might expect. BASF has announced its ten-year outlook on agricultural innovations that support food security for future generations, while minimizing the impact of farming on the climate and the environment. The company focuses on improving agricultural outcomes in major crops, like wheat, canola, soybean, corn, cotton, rice, as well as fruits and vegetables. These crops account for more than 50% of the world's farmland, which is why innovations applied on such a large scale have the potential to make farming even more productive and sustainable.
