Well, it doesn't. "How to make a green screen" could just as easily be "How to make a blue screen".Green and blue can be used as they differ more from the color of human skin, thus allowing the director to easily distinguish the background and subject of the film.It's about having a contrast with the colors of the skin, etc. Once you have your green screen, you need to think about lighting. It is very important that your lighting is set evenly or shadows and hotspots will have to be sampled by your software, which is not what you want. Here are our top five tips to properly illuminate your lighting.Lighting needs to be set evenly to avoid shadows and hot spots Use softbox lights as they cover the green screen evenly. This creates a separation between the subject and the background, making the removal of the green screen much easier for your softwarePlace the subject about 8 meters away from the screen to avoid shadows.Avoid wrinkles on the screen when blocking or hanging it up, it is advisable to roll the screen a bit to help ease the wrinkles caused by suspension at the end of the roller. Make sure you frame your shot so that all of the actor's movements stay within the frame and never go outside the green area.The Keylight plugin for After Effects is a good choice for editing What is the best software that a beginner can use to modify the video on the green screen? In Vimeo, we use a plugin in After Effects CS6 called Keylight. It is very popular in the post-production world and easy to use, so it is a great tool for learners.The main functions of Keylight are to remove the selected color and to suppress the spill of that color on the subject.Three top tips for editing1. Always show always movies in Matte Screen mode. This really helps to see how good your key is. By playing with the Clip Black and Clip White settings, you can make sure your key produces the best possible results and corrects mistakes you cannot see with the naked eye.2. Anything in black is in the background. Everything that is white is in the foreground. And all that's grey is a semi-transparent movie that would be better to get rid of. Screengain is a good way to help remove those greys. If you adjust Screengain down a bit, you will see that you have a cleaner background area.3. Be careful not to further do it on the Screengain setting, though. If you lower them too much in one direction or the other, you can remove the details from the image.Watch our video to see it all in action:Now you can finally send that DeLorean back in time or keep that T-Rex inside Jurassic Park! Well, maybe it is. But now you know the basics of green screening and this will bring a new level of experimentation into your videos.Keywords: From our friends at VimeoDon't miss out: The 20 best 3D movies for 2012 Playing video games is fun because it's one of the many recreational activities.
